

CONSPIRACY

From page 1

"That's just it," said Taylor. "It's a nutty thing."

Interestingly, the play will have a cast of only three men dressed in anything but the latest Elizabethan fashion and promises to "send the bard rolling in his grave."

After the "Dunes", an understated drama and the last production Theater Conspiracy put on at the Foulds Theater, this is quite a departure and evinces verve and strength of will on Taylor's part. Also, he intends to try out his previously suggested found theater productions.

The actors will be some old Theater Conspiracy members, Jordan Wilson and Christopher St. Louis, and there will be a newbie, Christopher Brent.

The comedy was written by Daniel Singer, Adam Long, and Jess Winfield and will be directed by Richard Westlake.

If you find Shakespeare intellectually daunting, fear not.

"Obviously in an hour-and-a-half we can't do all the plays — it's just three guys playing multiple characters," said Taylor. "That's the way this thing is written. To work for a modern audience even if you don't know Shakespeare."

Taylor effused gratitude for Prather allowing him this opportunity and said it would be a "springboard for our success in the future."

However, when asked about the future, Taylor expressed some uncertainty.

"We've been looking around but we have yet to find a space," Taylor said.

"There are some things that may work out but nothing is guaranteed at this point we are still hoping that some kind soul that has a space for us." ■
